Felt cute,

might lure some kids into the
sewer later, IDK.

Cassie on religion

Hello, everyone. This has been a very shitty few weeks for my family. My beautiful niece lost a baby that she carried the full nine months. It was some kind of infection that the doctors say they were unfamiliar with. It was all very sudden and heartbreaking. Luckily my niece, whom we almost lost as well, pulled through. She has shown her strength and relied on her faith to get her through this. I know that there will be a lot of hard days ahead for her and her husband but I'm glad they have their beliefs and family to get them through.

I, on the other hand, am finding myself more and more... faithless. I roll my eyes every time I hear the phrase "thoughts and prayers." Faith can't be forced — trust me, I've tried. I know that a lot of my friends' family will not want to hear this from me but I am not a fan of religion. I honestly never had blind faith in something, but I think religion hurts more than it helps. I'm not talking about one's individual faith; I'm talking about religion and the rules they expect you to fit what they want to believe in and how they believe you should act. I'm not saying I do not believe in God or his power — I do — but I first started to hate myself in church. It was mostly folks telling me I was going to hell. As a kid, that was the most terrifying thing in the world. I remember being in church with my best friend's family when I was about 11 or 12. We woke up early in the morning and his mom made pancakes and bacon. We got to church and one of the first things the pastor said was about how we were all
